Lithuania's men's basketball team emerges as a major competitor at the 1992 Barcelona Olympic Games after the collapse of the Soviet Union, thanks in part to financial support from the American rock band the Grateful Dead. This tale of athletic heroism recounts the training and indoctrination Soviet athletes had to go through before the collapse of the Soviet government in 1991, and the pressure the regime had once placed on sports heroes as living banners of Soviet might. But the independence-minded Lithuanians and Arvydas Sabonis, the star of the team, now carried the banner of a very different team with a very different meaning -- the quest for national independence.
